“You certainly came prepared, didn’t you?” said Mr. Stewart heartily. “We’d better keep these in the fridge.” He scooped the fish into a bowl and rushed away with them.

“Now,” said Mrs. Stewart a few moments later, after the excitement of the fish had died down, “we should work out where you’re going to sleep, Einstein. Children – clear the table, please.”

Imogen and Arthur had never cleared the table so quickly. They had probably never cleared the table so badly, either – but everyone was far too preoccupied with the presence of a penguin to take much notice.

Mr. Stewart fetched Arthur’s old baby blankets from the airing cupboard, while Mrs. Stewart pointed Einstein to the armchair by the fire. He seemed very happy with his own chair to sleep on, and belly flopped straight onto the cushion while Imogen draped one of the blankets over his back.

“Can we read the bedtime story downstairs with

Einstein?” asked Arthur, and Mrs. Stewart looked just about ready to agree when Imogen pointed out that Einstein was already fast asleep, and everyone tiptoed up the stairs to bed.

Review Praise for Einstein the Penguin

"Rangeley's wry, confiding tone and third-person narration are gently funny, offering a sense both of happy family life and safe adventure. Tazzyman's loose-lined, goggle-eyed cartoon drawings emphasize the humor." – Kirkus Reviews

"... the perfect choice full of amusing scenes, friendship, and family." – Always in the Middle

"... a world where friendship matters, small acts of bravery shine, and even the quietest characters can make the biggest difference — making it a truly beautiful, timeless read for children and parents alike." – Always a Storybook
